There is no real reason why the parties thereto, although they may approach each other from opposite points of view, should long remain at issue, but, however closely they may approximate, there will generally be found room for just those adjustable differences as to amount which in so many instances temporarily separate the willing buyer from the willing seller. Such differences, roughly classifiable under the headings of quantity and price, will always exist. If, however, the ground upon which these two factors are to operate has once been defined. the negotiations are not far from being satisfactorily
